The military ousted Argentina’s constitutional government in 1943. Perón, then an army colonel, was one of the coup’s leaders, and he soon became the government’s dominant figure as Minister of Labor. Elections carried him to the Presidency in 1946. He created the Partido Unico de la Revolucion, which became more commonly known as the Perónist or Justicialista Party (PJ). He aggressively pursued policies aimed at empowering the working class and greatly expanded the number of unionized workers. In 1947, Perón announced the first five-year plan based on the growth of industries he nationalized. He helped establish the powerful General Confederation of Labor (CGT). Perón’s charismatic wife, Eva Duarte de Perón, known as Evita (1919-1952), played a key role in developing support for her husband.
